Behavioral Health Services for Community Resiliency

As an emergency response winds down, the next phase, recovery, often marks the start of a long and complex journey to return a community to a sense of “normalcy.” This period almost always requires some form of behavioral health services. Behavioral health needs impact every age range and demographic and can be addressed through a variety of tools: psychological first aid administration, case management, crisis response teams, individual crisis counseling, information and referral services, etc. Children and youth are especially high-risk for post-disaster behavioral health issues. In September 2018, the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Administration (SAMHSA) released a research bulletin, Behavioral Health Conditions in Children and Youth Exposed to Natural Disasters.

MRC units are uniquely poised to support these needs through highly trained volunteers who have an unrivaled knowledge of their own local communities. Read More
